

I found a really good site on urban gardening. There is an article there called "Why We Will All Be Gardeners". It's about the movement that is the catalyst for this site you are on too. Gardening is not just for people out in the country with lots of space. It may be more important for urban residents to start thinking about it as food and fuel prices both skyrocket.

An awareness of this can lead to political pressure to be brought to allocate space both on the ground and in and on buildings for food production. As cities like NY continue to allow building non-stop with almost a complete lack of planning for the future sustainability of the residents, the time has come to start thinking about the implications of this. We can all take small steps for ourselves but it will take awareness of sustainability on a large scale to bring about the changes we need.

Here is the link to the article:
Why we will all be gardeners.